There is a plethora of skills, attributes and values that she has learnt and reflected from the course so far, and she is sure there is more to be taught. Self-reflection on tone and how you conduct yourself as a health worker, remaining empathetic and non-judgmental, prioritizing honesty, safety and maintaining morality. Learning to adapt and overcome challenges, build on resilience and perseverance and to not give up if things are uncertain or unknown to you, since being a doctor isn't just memorising biological facts of the human body but rather applying them to unknown situations to ensure the best possible outcome for everyone involved. Overall, the experience thus far has been quite exhilarating and insightful and has fueled her passion in becoming a medic.
